01/ In the small fishing village near Cape Tappi you can see a large number of colorful beach shacks made from iron sheeting. 02/ Everyone seems to find a little more pace with multi-athlete Tetsuya Tanaka leading the way, riding between villages. 03/ The opening of Hokkaido Shinkansen Okutsugaru-Imabetsu Station in March 2016 greatly improved access to the Tsugaru Peninsula. 04/ The pedestrian only Stairway Highway. Cyclists usually carry their bikes up this section. Other tourists cheer you on. 05/ A town signboard made using the blades from a wind turbine. "Welcome to the cape of the wind" it says along the road to Tappi. 06/ Looking out over the tip of Cape Tappi, said to have wind strong enough for a dragon to fly.

Tsugaru-Imabetsu Station's name was changed to Okutsugaru-Imabetsu Station with the opening of the Hokkaido Shinkansen. Departing from this station, we are guided on this course by multi-athlete Tetsuya Tanaka. Tanaka is a one-legged cyclist who represented Japan in the Paralympics.

Heading north along the coastal road, we pass by colorful shacks made of iron sheeting and buoys strewn along the beach. The Okuya Inn where the famous Japanese author Dazai Osamu apparently once stayed has been converted into the Cape Tappi Tourist Information Center. Photos are on display showing the building in its heyday. No one would have imagined then that a wonderful cycling track would have been built right here.

Continuing on we come to Stairway Highway 339, a pedestrian only section. After climbing to the top we arrive at Cape Tappi, described in Dazai's novel Tsugaru as the "cul-de-sac of Honshu." Apparently the name Tappi originates from the fact that wind is strong enough for a dragon to fly. The sight of the Tsugaru Strait from the cliff top is breathtakingly beautiful.
